J. H. T. C. Salatem et Annum Platonicum.

The bee, which, while under proper control and management, is one of man's best friends, proves, when assalled by him in any way, a terrible niversary. Allusion is made to this by Moses in his story of what befell the Israelites in their wilderness sojourning the house of the property The juice of bees, not lincolus, here behold, Which limitsh bards were went to quuff of Which liritish bards were went to quiff of old:

King David must have witnessed just such a seene, which he reproduces in his description of the fierce attacks, the determined onshughts of his bitter and unrelenting foes: "All nutions compassed me about foes: "All nntions compassed me about they compassed me about like bees."

In England at the present time, mead, like many other old and excellent domestic compounds, has passed almost entirely out of use. In very few houses could it now be found. Here and there in a farmhouse where old enstons linger, it may still be had; and it is still used for colds and other complaints, both in the case of men and entite. The revival of bee-keeping and the conduct of the enterprise on scientific principles, will restore honey to its wonted place in the domestic economy; and if carefully studied and thriftily managed, the cultivation of bees and the product of honey may be made to form not only an important article of bees."
Somewhat recently, the mishau of a porter in handling n box of bees in trans.t by railway created an amusing and rather ularming scene at the station. There was a general slumpede of passengers and officials flying in every direct on, chased by the infuriated bees. CAUSES AND EFFECTS OF IN TEMPERANCE.

Read By Miss Richie Campbell, Before the Temperance Society of Empire, on the 23rd Ult.

Every one is aware of the evil and degrading lufineuce which strong drink has upon men who indulge lu drinkling. A great deal has been said against it, but still there are many who will drink to excess. There is, throughout the community an almost universal desire to save those who frequently indulge in strong drink, from the degradation of a drunkard. Men would not become slaves to the wine-cup If they would only take courage, but they for want of courage bring upon them-selves years of misery and woe. Here arises some of the most dangerous causes of intemperance. One man has not courage to refuse to drink with a friend; another can not help taking a dram. Beware of only a dram, you do not know where it will lead you. And that friend whe will dram, you do not know where it will lead you. And that friend who will small coal yard in a game of dice at offer you a dram of ilquor, is the worst enemy that you have. Alselwould be may do you a favor withough he may do you a favor with though he may do you a favor with the sel wou. tlemon which calls for more brandy mutil you become intexleated, bring yourself lower than a brute, and con sequently lose your money by gamb-ling, or get robbed in a drunken crowd; what enemy could do worse?

Low company is the worst cause of intemperance. The number of men who could be useful, but who are atterly worthless because of the company they keep, can not be count-company they keep, can not be count-come of ever $60,000.

An amateur ence asked Liszt how to play the plane with sonl. The genial master replied: "You must innoural labits, who will lead them in turn will are utterly worthless because of the twenty-four years old, with an lo into saloons, and they in turn will visit saloons to find such company. visit saloons to find such company.

And what is the consequence? They ln gold letters, are fasidonable fancies become inopeless drunkards.

Another cause of intemperance is idleness. A man for the want of something to do, some way to amuse himself, enters a grog-shop where he is sure to find plenty of loungers like itimself and when he returns he is generally a specimen of debauchery and degradation. Some useful "vote as you pray." and later on he occupation, or some good look might save many a young man from the crime and ignounly which intemperance produces. But intemperance is not confined to those who are caities and confined to those who are caities. ed idiers. There are men who earn their dally bread by the sweat of the of the Boston schools the other day brow, and who have loved ones de-pending on them for support, that will throw away their hard-carned mouey for a few draws of the poison-ous fluid. Why is this? It is the natural love for liquor, and they can not resist the temptation to drink. Lack of courage again. Man is weak. It is encouraged in every undertaking and withheld from every temptation. There is a time when the little patter for the courage. temptatiou. There is a time when all kis better feelings seem dead, and nothing but the brutality of his naturo is left to mock his race. This is when he is under the influence of that baneful drug—whisky. It love and friendship fail to remove that fatal cup, there must be something stronger. Something that will guard him against the dictates of his meaner under the dictates of his meaner with a stignilian.

Something that will glard him against the dictates of his mean-ter nature, and guide him in the path which the pure and noble tread. It which the pure and noble tread. It wint Dover and Calias in tifty-eight minutes. That is how far England the prayers of the wife, mother and and France are apart. sisters are of no avail, what can savo him from a drunkard's grave, but the Temperance pledge? A pledge be-fore God and man surely would not be broken. It is needless to mention fore God and man surely would not be broken. It is needless to mention the evil effects of intemperance. They are seen in every day life, and those who have experience feel too keenly the pain. The jails are full of pulpers and the State-prison full of convicts. No murderent to criminal that ever suffered a death of shame upon the gallows, but would say he began life of crime in the bar-room. Rosist the temptation. Evil temptation leads to woe. [Cblengo News.] In a clinical lecture at the College of Physicians and Surgeons last evening Dr. Henry S. Reynolds called attention to the peculiar case of a colored boy in the city whose skin is gradually turning white. Such cases are rare, the doctor sald, but this caso was especially peculiar in that, while the father and mother of the boy were both negroes, the mother and six of the twelve children were also spotted. One of the remaining children had white halr over a part of his scalp, while the other five were all black. The change in all the spotted black. The change in all the spotted members of the family began whilo they were still young. The disease which causes this change was known as viiilgo, and was probable due to the street, and the second made a countrie cure and Account an impaired function of the nerves that presided over the putrition of
